A Father and Son’s Best Photos

Introduction
by Jon Tarrant, Teacher and Former Editor of the British Journal of Photography.

Gustave Flaubert coined the phrase, “Le bon Dieu est dans le detail,” around the time photography was invented. Flaubert pointed out that the good of the world (not the Devil, as the saying is often recounted) is to be found in the detail of what is done, and this aphorism is particularly appropriate to the photographs of David and Matthew Marcou. The Marcou’s’ pictures are slices of life, frozen in time. They are “ordinary” images in that they depict people and events as they occurred, even when some of the people are themselves extraordinary. Often the backgrounds and edges of their pictures contain elements that contextualize the main subject in ways that constructed, idealized, and digitally manipulated images either miss, or erase.

Matt’s photograph of a WWII P-51 Mustang fighter flying the Stars-and-Stripes, for example, includes an imprint of the date when the picture was taken, and features children playing in the background, documenting the interaction that existed between people and historic machinery, and recording the year this happened.

In a similar vein, David’s Commitment billboard photograph, featuring a portrait of the British WWII Prime Minister, Winston Churchill, has in the sky a vapor trail that echoes Churchill’s Battle of Britain speech, acknowledging the debt owed by many to the few who fought and won.

Yet another picture of David’s shows a man sitting atop a penny-farthing style bicycle: there’s wisdom and nervousness in the foreground, but it is the smiling encouragement of the bystander in the background that gives the picture particular depth.

Some of the Marcou’s photographs are more straightforward, but often it’s necessary to digest the entire picture and the relationship of all the elements, to appreciate the full significance of the recorded scene – just as Flaubert suggested.

Preface
by Co-Author David J. Marcou, with Co-Author Matthew A. Marcou.

John Winthrop called America a “city upon a hill,” adding, “The eyes of all people are upon us.” When we document others, others document us, too. We’re all family, hoping for human respect and positive chemistry, whether American or non-American. But there are still good things to see via American eyes, like Matt’s and mine.

Humanity’s significance is we are just significant enough, and aware of it. If you can photograph “ordinary” (everyday) people well, you can do so with the well-known, too, “in moments of their own”, as Robert Kee says. And people needn’t pose in studios for vital likenesses; we take many photos in public. My own photos began ca. 1980, and Matt’s, ca. 1991. These are our best photos; two or three were even printed before with my pen-name Robert Joseph.

Jane Bown says, black-and-white “emphasizes the underlying patterns of light and dark and confers a natural harmony on the subject”. Still, we’ve color reproductions, too. I reported from colorful London and Seoul in the 1980s; my son has photographed in many places, as well. Today, Matt is an Army Ranger; tomorrow, we hope he’s President.

Our thanks go to my parents (Rose C. Muskat Marcou and David A. Fitzgerald Marcou), our extended family, production team, and archivists. We’re also grateful to our sponsors and our income, healthcare, security, and amenities providers. And we thank God, too. When all our books are published, we hope to do justice to all our subjects. But if you don’t enjoy this book at first, use “verbal helps” (swearing) to get through it, like Mark Twain did with his shaving. In the end, then, the mind’s eye will essentially be soothed by this book, made especially for you, dear readers.
